DEDICATION

To my mom, the first person who ever narrated a story to me. And to my friends and family, who supported me throughout the journey. I am truly grateful to have all of you as my near and dears.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

I am deeply grateful to my friends and family. Your continuous support gave me the strength to follow my passion and bring this story to life.

There were moments that tested my confidence and resilience. During those times, your kind words were the energy I needed to keep going.

I have always loved reading, and for a long time, I wanted to write something meaningful. At 21, I believed I would write a self-help book. But today, I am grateful that this journey led me to become the author of a children's storybook.

The idea for this story began when I came across a TED-Ed article that said, "Reading fictional stories is good for one's mental health." It took nearly two years for that idea to take shape.

There are many people I would like to thank. Starting with my mom, and including Vijay Aditya Maranganti, Arun Reddy Thadasina, Anusha Poontah, Sainath Reddy Yelamati, Meera Aashika, Harshil Tomar, Keerthana Katikareddy, Alexandra Keogh, Sean T. Rose, Bala Nayak, Vishaka Shetty, Ashwin Chand Mahesh, Prashanth Chindam, Yashwanth Lega, Abhishek Kannuri, and my entire family—thank you for your support throughout this journey.

I would also like to thank my editor Esther, my inspiration Gary Vee, and the Facebook communities for new authors. I learned so much from all of you, and this book would not have been possible without your guidance.

CHAPTER 1
FINDING COCO IN THE CLOOSH VALLEY

It was a Sunday evening, around 4 p.m. The sun was slowly setting, and the birds were flying back to their nests. The forest trail was quiet, with no one around except a lone car cruising down the narrow lane.

Padraig, who worked at a nearby wind farm, was on his way home from Cloosh Valley.

About eight miles from his newly built house, near the end of the forest trail, he noticed a small puppy running along the road.

At first glance, he assumed the puppy must be with its family. But after driving half a mile ahead, something didn't feel right. Uneasy, Padraig looked into his rearview mirror.

"No…"

There was no one around. The little puppy was all alone, wandering through the forest.

It was winter in Ireland, and darkness would fall within the next half hour. Without thinking twice, Padraig slowed down and reversed his SUV toward the tiny four-month-old puppy.

The puppy, a young German Shepherd with soft golden eyes, had lost sight of his family while wandering through the woods. After waiting in the same place for what felt like forever, he had finally started moving, hoping to find them.

By the time Padraig pulled over, the puppy had been alone for hours. He looked tired, cold, and frightened.

“Hello there, little fella… what are you doing out here?” Padraig said softly.

The puppy paused.

Around his neck was a small collar. A bright orange tag read "Coco."

Padraig could tell that Coco was not a stray. The way he stopped running and looked up, there was trust in his eyes, even through the fear.

Just then, Padraig's phone rang.

"Dad, where are you?" Riley's voice came through.

"Riley, I'm on my way home—five minutes. And I've got a surprise for you."

"Really? I don't believe you... It's easy!" she teased.

Padraig smiled. "Ahh, Riley... what's Momma doing?"

"She's in the kitchen, cooking something. Do you want to talk to her?"

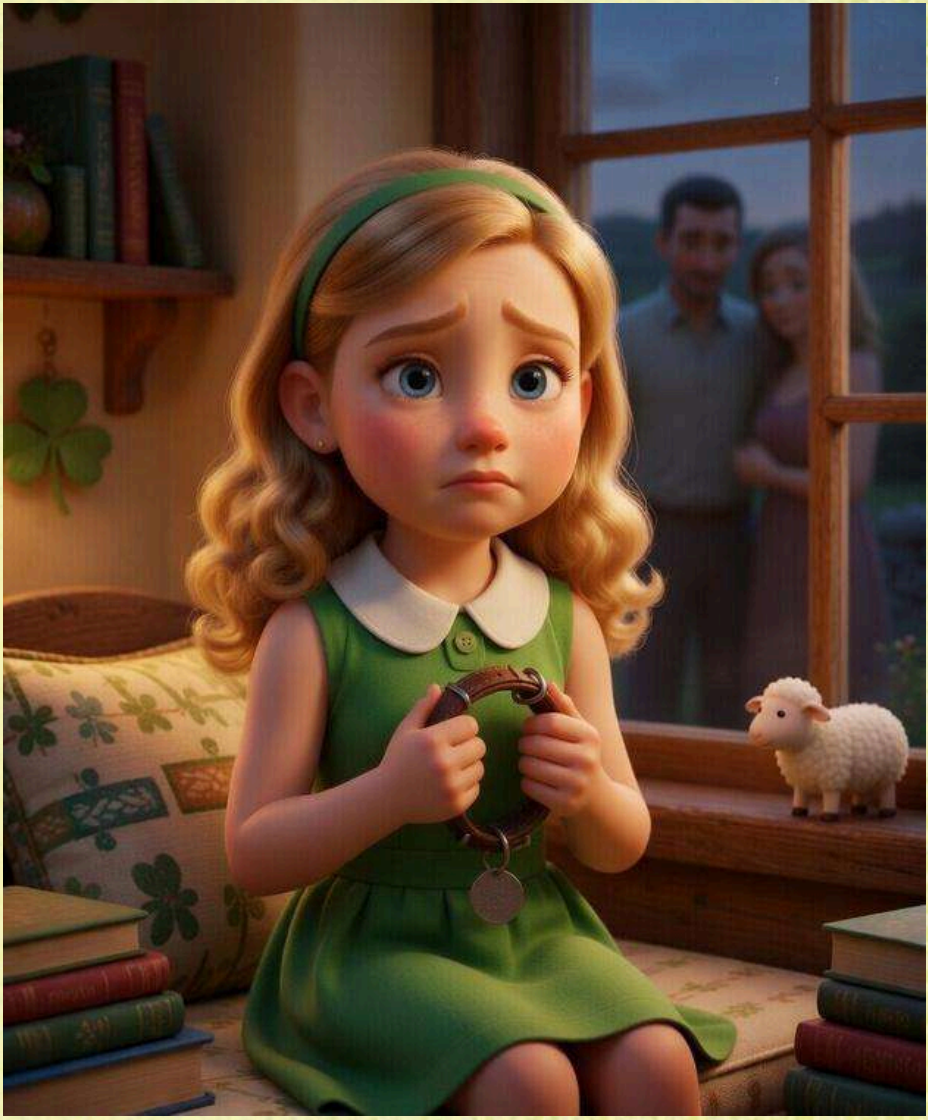
"I will, once I'm home."
"Okay then. See you!"
"See you, love."

A few minutes later, after hours of wandering and fear, Coco finally reached a place he didn't yet know—but one that would soon become his home.

Padraig gently carried him to the front door.

"There you go, little fella... we're home. Let's go meet Riley and Momma."

He rang the doorbell.



Some memories stay close to the heart.

CHAPTER 2: RILEY MEETS COCO

Riley, the daughter of Padraig and Anita, had always wanted a puppy.

When she was younger, the family had a Labrador named Bailey. Bailey was the kindest dog anyone could ever meet. After she passed away, the family felt a quiet emptiness in the house. It was too painful, and they decided not to have another pet.

Until today.

Padraig knocked on the door, holding Coco gently in his arms.

Inside the house, Riley pushed her tablet aside and jumped off her bed the moment she heard the door.

“Momma! Daddy’s home!” she shouted, her voice full of excitement.

She rushed through the hallway and reached the door.

“What’s the surprise, Dad?” she asked eagerly, so excited that she forgot to open it.

A surprise that brings pure joy.

Padraig chuckled. “Open the door, and you’ll find out.”

Riley quickly opened it.

And there he was.

A small, scruffy puppy with golden eyes, a soft coat, and a wagging tail—looking right at her.

For a brief moment, Padraig watched closely. He wasn’t sure how Coco would react. He didn’t know what kind of environment Coco had come from, or whether he was used to children.

But Riley didn’t hesitate.

Her eyes widened with wonder. She slowly opened her arms.

Coco looked at her… and in the very next second, jumped straight into her embrace, his tail wagging with pure joy.

“Dad… I love you!” Riley exclaimed.

“What’s his name?”

“Is he ours?”

“Will he stay with us?”

“Momma! Daddy brought us a puppy!”

Coco, now comfortable, began licking Riley’s face happily. Riley laughed, holding him close.

“Hello, Coco… do you like me?”

“I love you.”

And just like that, Coco had found not just a home, but a family.

Riley and Coco become friends instantly.

CHAPTER 3: RILEY, COCO, AND THE OUGHTERARD

Oughterard is a small, charming town near Galway in Ireland. Known for its scenic beauty and its annual fishing festival, it is a place where people live simple, happy lives.

The people of Oughterard are warm, friendly, and always welcoming. Padraig's family fit right in.

Riley's elder brothers, Mark and Padraig Jr., were well known in the town, especially during the fishing festival held every May. They were often among those who caught the biggest fish, drawing attention and admiration from everyone around.

Coco quickly became a favorite in the neighborhood.

Every morning, Padraig and Riley would take Coco out for a walk or a light trek. Before long, Coco became their constant companion—always energetic, always ready.

At home, the day began early.

Anita would wake up at 5 a.m., and Padraig at 6. Their mornings were filled with simple routines: cleaning, preparing breakfast, and getting everyone ready for the day.

Coco would usually be the first to wake. By the time Padraig stepped out, Coco would already be stretching, shaking himself awake, and waiting eagerly for Riley.

Riley, as always, woke up to the sound of her alarm.

“Coo-koo-coo-koo…” it rang at 6:15 a.m.

Within minutes, the three of them would be in the car, heading to Corribdale Park every day except Sundays.

By 6:30 a.m., they were already jogging.

Riley always wanted to hold Coco’s leash, but Padraig preferred to handle it himself. Coco was still young and full of energy, and Riley was yet to learn how to control him properly.

Coco finds a new home filled with love.

At home, Coco spent most of his time with Riley and Mark—playing in the yard, watching tele, and even following them into the kitchen as if he wanted to help.

Coco loved his new family.

And in his own little way, he tried to be part of everything they did.

Every May, the town came alive with the fishing festival. Mark and Padraig Jr. were always among the highlights of the event.

For Coco, it was his first time experiencing something like this.

He watched with curiosity as people fished by the river. And, of course, he had his own fun—playing near the water, chasing tiny fish, and staying close to Riley.

For Coco, every day felt like a new adventure.

Every walk becomes an adventure together.

CHAPTER 4: LAZY SUNDAY, TIKTOK & REELS

Mark, Riley's elder brother, was an art student.
He loved painting and decided to share his work on platforms like Instagram and TikTok.

Slowly, he began connecting with people who appreciated his art—and even started selling his paintings.

It didn't take long for him to find success.

Every day, Mark and his friends posted new artwork online, building a small but loyal audience.

Watching this, Riley and Anita grew curious about how these platforms worked.

They loved watching pet videos together—funny, heartwarming, and sometimes surprising.

One day, an idea struck them.

"Why don't we create a page for Coco?" Riley asked.

Anita smiled.

Padraig, as always, was supportive. “If it makes you happy, go for it,” he said.

The very next day, Anita learned how to create a page, record videos, and post them online—thanks to Mark’s guidance.

Soon, it became part of their daily routine.

They recorded small moments from their lives:

- Coco running in the yard.
- Coco swimming.
- Coco playing with other dogs.
- Coco sitting beside Riley during meals.

Simple moments—but full of joy.

One Sunday afternoon, while everyone was at home, Coco ran into the lawn and began chasing a small creature.

“Momma! Coco is chasing that little squirrel again!” Riley shouted.

Anita laughed. “Let him play, Riley.”

The moment was too funny to miss.

Anita quickly picked up her phone and started recording.

Coco darted back and forth, full of energy, while the tiny animal cleverly dodged him. It was playful, harmless, and unexpectedly entertaining.

The next day, they posted the video along with their usual content.

That night, everything seemed normal. But the next morning—

Anita woke up to her phone buzzing nonstop. Notifications. Messages. Alerts.

“Padraig… look at this!” she said, shaking him awake. “Our page has 40,000 followers!”

Padraig, still half-asleep, smiled faintly. “Wake me when it reaches a million,” he murmured, turning back.

But Anita knew exactly who would be the most excited.

“Riley!” she called out. “Coco’s page has 40,000 followers!”

A little fun turns into something special.

CHAPTER 5: OUGHTERARD'S NEW STARS

"40,000 followers?" Riley's eyes widened.

"I knew it! Coco is going to be a star!" she said, running toward him.

"Hey, Coco—you're a star now!"

Coco wagged his tail, his golden eyes bright with excitement.

"Woof! Woof!"

Soon, Riley and Coco posted a new video—dancing to the tune of Scooby-Doo.

Riley's friends saw it and shared it. Their friends shared it too.

The videos spread quickly.

Coco's page kept growing—bigger than most pet accounts in nearby towns, even surpassing Mark's art page.

People from Oughterard and beyond began to recognize Coco.

Messages started pouring in:

“We love Coco!”

“Can we collaborate with you?”

“Do you have merchandise?”

“Would you attend our event?”

“Can you promote our dog food?”

Anita’s phone was flooded with calls, messages, and requests.

Mark, noticing the attention, also encouraged Anita to engage with the audience more actively.

Anita, with her understanding of business and social media, saw an opportunity.

She agreed to take Coco and Riley to an event in Galway—a bigger town nearby.

The event manager, Ainé, sent VIP passes for the family. Mark was also invited to showcase his paintings.

At the event, Coco and Riley became the center of attention.

People recognized Coco instantly.

They came forward for photos, selfies, and even autographs.

“Look, Coco! So many cookies and treats!” Riley laughed.

“Woof!” Coco responded, just as excited.

When they performed their now-famous dance on stage, the crowd cheered loudly.

Laughter filled the hall.

Applause echoed.

For the first time—

Coco and Riley weren’t just part of a family.

They had become something more.

They had become the stars of Oughterard.

CHAPTER 6: SAVED

Coco and Riley's performances at the art festival quickly became popular among children in Galway.

Their videos spread rapidly. Their followers grew. Invitations began to pour in.

More events. More recognition. More excitement.

Within a few months, their lives had changed.

But some things remained the same.

Their mornings.
Their routine.
Their bond.

Padraig, meanwhile, made sure Riley stayed focused on her studies, balancing her growing popularity with her responsibilities.

Nearly six months after their first big event, one morning felt slightly different.

Padraig was out of town for work.

Riley decided to take Coco out for a walk—on her own.

Instead of heading to their usual park, she chose the nearby trail.

Coco loved the river. He loved watching fish leap through the flowing water.

That morning, they reached the trail around 7:15 a.m.

The path was quiet.

Still.
Peaceful.

They had barely begun walking when—

“Help me… please!”

A voice cut through the silence.

Riley froze.

Her grip tightened around Coco’s leash.
She looked around—but saw no one.

“Help me!”

The voice came again.

Louder this time.

Clear.

Coco suddenly pulled forward.

“No—Coco, wait!” Riley said, trying to hold him back.

But Coco resisted.

With a sharp tug, he slipped free and ran toward the river.

“Coco!” Riley shouted, panic rising in her voice as she ran after him.

When she reached the riverbank, she saw him.

A man—struggling in the water.

Clinging desperately to a tree branch.

The current was strong.

Too strong.

Something doesn’t feel right… and Coco knows it.

Riley's heart began to race.

Her hands trembled as she quickly pulled out her phone and called Mark.

"Mark! Brother!" she cried.

"Riley? What happened? Where are you?"

"We came to the river trail… someone is drowning!"

"Stay there! Don't go near the water. I'm close—I'm coming with friends. Is Coco with you?"

But Riley had already started running.

"Coco! Buddy! Come back!"

Coco had reached the edge of the river. The man was still holding on—but barely.

"Hold on!" Riley shouted. "My brother is coming!"

Nearby, thick ropes lay tied to wooden posts—used by fishermen to secure their boats.

Coco's eyes locked onto them.

Something shifted.

Something instinctive.

He grabbed one rope with his teeth and dragged it toward the water, pushing it forward.

The rope floated, but fell short.

Not enough.
Coco ran back.
Grabbed another.
Tried again.
Still not enough.

For a brief second, he paused.
Then,

Without hesitation, Coco jumped into the river with the rope.

The cold water rushed around him as he swam against the current, the rope clenched tightly in his mouth.

“Coco… no…” Riley whispered, frozen in fear.

The current pushed hard—but Coco kept moving.

Closer.

Closer.

Finally, he reached the man.

The man, exhausted but alert, grabbed the rope with one hand while still holding onto the branch with the other.

The current was getting stronger.

Riley stood at the riverbank, tears in her eyes, shouting for help.

Moments later—

Mark arrived.

“Riley!”

He ran toward her, his friends close behind.

They saw the rope.
They saw the man.
They saw Coco.

Without wasting a second, they grabbed the rope and began pulling.

One of Mark’s friends, a strong swimmer, stepped into the water to help guide them.

Slowly…

Carefully…

They pulled them closer.

Closer…

Until finally, they reached the shore.

The man collapsed onto the ground, gasping for breath.

“Thank you… thank you… you saved my life…”

It was Keith, Padraig’s neighbor.

Relief washed over everyone. Riley ran forward and hugged Coco tightly. Mark joined them. All three held on, safe at last.

Within minutes, the rescue team arrived.
The crowd gathered.

And for Riley—

For Coco—

This was more than just a moment. It was the day everything changed.

CHAPTER 7: DADDY'S BUSINESS

Padraig had just landed in Dublin.

As he switched his phone back on, he expected the usual flood of messages.

But something felt strange.

There were missed calls.
Notifications.
But nothing from home.

Not a single message.

A quiet uneasiness settled in.

Then he noticed a missed call from Keith.

He called back immediately.

"Hello, Keith. How are you?"

"Padraig… I'm good. Thanks to your kids."
Padraig paused.

"Thanks to my kids? I haven't heard from them. Is everything alright?"

Keith took a breath.

“I fell into the river yesterday… the current was strong. Riley, Mark, and Coco—they saved me. If it wasn’t for them…”

Padraig went silent.

For a moment, he couldn’t speak.

Then, softly—

“Thank God you’re safe.”

He ended the call and immediately rang Anita.

“Hey… is everything alright?”

“Yes, everything’s fine,” Anita said gently. “I’m sorry—I meant to call you.”

“What happened?”

She explained everything.

The walk.
The river.
The rescue.

Padraig listened quietly.

No interruption.

No questions.

Just silence.

When the call ended, he sat still for a moment. Processing it all.

Then he made his way back home.

Meanwhile, the story had already spread.

It reached local news.

People were talking.

By the time Padraig was on his way, his phone was flooded with messages.

Among them was a voicemail from Ainé, his business partner.

“Padraig, I just heard what happened. I spoke to Anita—thank God everyone is safe. And listen—this is big. I was with Mary when we saw the news. She wants to meet your family… and she’s ready to invest in our business.”

Padraig listened again.

Just to be sure.

Then he called her back.

“Ainé… is this real? Mary wants to invest?”

“Yes. We’re coming to Oughterard tomorrow. She wants to begin everything from there.”

Padraig leaned back.

Overwhelmed.

In a single moment—

He had received two pieces of news:

His children had risked their lives to save someone.

And his business—his dream—was finally taking off.

That evening, he reached home.

The house was quiet.

The kids were asleep.

Anita sat nearby, replying to messages.

Padraig walked into the room slowly.

He sat beside Riley. Gently kissed her forehead.

Then ran his fingers through Mark's hair.

A quiet smile formed on his face.

Not pride alone. Something deeper. Gratitude.

Anita walked in.

"Are you okay?" she asked softly.

Padraig nodded.

"You know what happened today?" he said.

"What?" she asked.

"One of the most respected investors in Europe wants to invest in our business."

Anita smiled.

"You deserve it."

He paused.

Then added—

“She said something else too… she said we raised wonderful children.”

Anita hugged him.

And in that moment—

Everything felt complete.

Happiness grows when shared with family.

CHAPTER 8: BUSTING THE BURGLARY

It was the Christmas season.

The town of Oughterard was glowing with lights. Homes were decorated, laughter filled the air, and families spent time together.

At Padraig's home, the day had been full of warmth with guests, conversations, and celebration.

By night, the house finally settled into silence.

Everyone was asleep.

Or so it seemed.

A faint sound echoed through the hallway.

Inside the children's room, Coco lifted his head. His ears stood alert.

A low growl followed.

Riley stirred. "Coco… what is it?"

Mark turned slightly. "It's probably nothing… go back to sleep."

But Coco didn't relax.

Riley sensed it too—something wasn't right.

She quietly reached for Mark's tablet and opened the CCTV app.

The front door was slightly open.

The guest room was disturbed.

And then,

A man. Moving inside their house.

Riley's voice dropped to a whisper. "Mark… wake up."

Mark sat up immediately. One look at the screen—and he understood.

"Call Mom and Dad," Riley said.

Mark nodded and dialed them first, quickly explaining the situation. Then he called the police. Within moments, Padraig and Anita, who were in another part of the house, were alerted.

They moved carefully.

No panic.

No noise.

Just awareness.

Padraig quietly locked the internal access points and ensured everyone stayed in their rooms.

Anita stayed with the children, keeping them calm. Coco stood near the door—silent, alert.

The thief continued moving, unaware that the family was now fully awake and coordinated.

Minutes passed.

Then—

Sirens.

The sound grew louder.

The thief froze. Panic replaced his confidence.

He rushed toward the door, trying to escape before anyone could stop him.

But as he reached the hallway, Padraig stepped forward.

The thief hesitated for a split second—then tried to push past him.

In that brief moment, there was a struggle.

Not a fight—but a sudden, tense scuffle.

Padraig held his ground, blocking the way, trying to keep distance between the intruder and his family.

The thief tried to break free.

But the delay was enough. Within seconds, the police rushed in through the door.

“Hands where we can see them!” they shouted.

The thief stopped.

Caught.

Just like that—it was over.

Everyone was safe. Everything was under control again.

Coco stood alert, watching closely, his tail still

Even in the dark, courage stands strong.

Chapter 9: THE REUNION

It was the season of joy—the season of family, togetherness, and gift-giving.

Across Oughterard, it was the most wonderful time of the year.

Padraig and Annitta's extended family had gathered to celebrate Christmas. The house was filled with laughter, conversations, and warmth.

The kids were at their happiest.

And Coco—

Coco was having the best time of all, receiving cookies and treats from everyone.

Just then, Padraig's phone rang.

"Hello?"

"Hello, hi… how are you?"

"I'm very well. Merry Christmas. And who's this?" Padraig asked.

“Hi, Padraig. My name is Jim Kavanagh. I live in Dublin,” the man said.

“Hi, Jim. How can I help you?” Padraig replied.

“Padraig… a few months ago, my family and I were in Galway. During that time, we lost our puppy, Coco.

Recently, I saw Coco in a local newspaper. Thank you so much. It meant a lot to us. We also came across Coco’s page, and we truly appreciate everything you’ve done for him.”

Padraig smiled.

“You don’t know how much Coco has meant to our family. Since the day I brought him home from Cloosh Valley, our lives have changed for the better.”

The conversation continued for nearly an hour.

Jim shared how his daughter, Megan, had been trying tirelessly to find Coco. After months of searching, seeing Coco online finally gave them hope.

After listening patiently, Padraig gently asked.

“Jim… would you like to take Coco back home?”

There was a brief pause.

Then came a warm reply.

“Yes.”

“Alright, Jimmy. Let’s meet soon. Merry Christmas to you and your family.”

“Cheers, Padraig. We’ll be in Oughterard after Christmas.”

After the call, Padraig shared everything with the family.

There was a mix of emotions.

Joy—and a little sadness.

But deep down, Padraig knew he had made the right choice.

Two days later, Jim arrived in Oughterard with his daughter, Megan.

Padraig met them by the river and welcomed them warmly.

At home, Annitta, Riley, and Mark greeted the guests.

Coco saw the guests.

For a moment, he stood still.

Then suddenly, he ran forward.

He jumped onto Jim and Megan, his bright golden eyes shining, his bushy tail wagging with excitement.

He moved between both families, full of joy.

After spending time together, sharing lunch and stories, it was time to leave.

Riley walked up to Coco.

“Bye, Coco,” she said softly.

Coco came close, wagging his tail.

“I’ll miss you,” she said.

Coco embraced the warm hug, then went back to his family.

Riley smiled.

Some goodbyes are filled with love and hope.

The family thanked Padraig and his family warmly and left for Dublin.

In the days that followed, life slowly returned to normal.

The house felt a little quieter.

But everyone moved on, carrying the memories with them.

One afternoon, after a few months, Riley received a call.

“Hi Riley, this is Megan.”

Riley smiled.

“We were wondering… would you like to come to Dublin and visit us—and Coco?”

Riley looked at her parents.

They smiled.

“I’d love to,” she said.

And just like that, Coco was still a part of her life.

Just… in a different way.

Megan smiled on the call.

“And Riley… there’s something else I want to show you when you visit.”

“Something really cool. It’s not just about Coco this time… it’s something new.”

Riley paused—curious.

“What is it?”

Megan laughed softly.

“I’ll show you when you get here.”

Riley thought her adventures with Coco had just begun…

But what she didn’t know was—

Her next adventure would take her beyond the real world.

Into a place where anything is possible…

Something special awaits in Dublin.

MORAL OF THE STORY

We all love stories, don't we? For generations, stories have helped us understand life—how to care, how to grow, and how to become better people.

And in the story of Adventures of Riley & Coco, there are a few simple but powerful lessons worth remembering.

1. Kindness is a real strength

If Padraig hadn't stopped to help a lost puppy, none of the beautiful moments that followed would have happened.

And when Riley chose to care for others, it brought unexpected goodness back into her life.

2. Parents act out of love

Sometimes parents say "no" not because they don't care—but because they care deeply.

Padraig and Annitta hesitated to bring home a puppy because they remembered the pain of losing Bailey.

Their decisions were always guided by love.

3. Social media is just a tool

It's not good or bad—it depends on how we use it. Mark, Riley, and their family used it to spread joy, grow together, and support others.

4. Patience helps us through difficult times

Life isn't always easy.

Just like the man who held onto hope in the river, we too must stay patient and keep going, even when things feel uncertain.

5. Courage can come from anyone

Coco showed bravery. So did Riley and Mark.

Sometimes, even small acts of courage can change everything.

6. Hard work matters more than quick success

Mark didn't build everything overnight.

It took effort, teamwork, and persistence.

What we often see is success—but behind it is always hard work.

7. Trust your instincts

Life doesn't always come with clear answers.
Padraig and Annitta trusted their instincts as parents.

Riley followed her heart. And those choices shaped their journey.

8. Make your family proud

Not through success alone—but through kindness, responsibility, and love. That is what truly matters.

9. Good things come from doing good

Kindness has a way of finding its way back.

When you help others, life often finds a way to help you too.

And finally…

Stories don't end when the last page is over. They stay with us—in the choices we make, and in the way we treat others. So take what you've learned, in your own small way… and carry it forward. Because somewhere, just like Riley and Coco…

Your own adventure is waiting.

Thank You for Being Part of This Adventure
